

About heroism

"But thanks to the heroism of the Secret Service and the determination of the physicians and staff at George Washington Hospital, Jim lived and so did the president"

They signed up to do this job, they were selected to do it and there is no heroism there.

Heroism is if you are on the beach with your family enjoying the sun and suddenly somebody is drawing in the distance.

There is probably a shark involved because you are a nerd who lost his vision while sitting on the computer during studies.

You worked very hard in your life, you are educated and you have something, you accumulated some dose of respect in your life.

Scenario #1: Shark attack

Everybody around this notices the event, they start talking about the event, somebody starts commenting, somebody takes a photo, somebody laughs and there is a guy or few of them who start swimming to the victim and crying along the way because of uncertainty. The smartest observers will take notebooks and justify their situation, somebody will record the event, somebody will start making research papers, and everybody will start talking a lot.

From this cohort of swimmers, 2 are going to the victim, they are fighting each other and communicating along the way about who will take a victim and who will fight the shark. Other swimmers form concentric circles around the incident and start cheering.

They are scared of the situation that they will lose limbs or become mentally disabled. They might save an idiot and maybe become disabled. Then his/her family, friends, and society will over time gradually and barely noticeably lose respect for them and start to treat them as 3-year-olds. Snobbish intellectuals and people would gather around the dinner plates, quote each other neural cells, make speeches prohibit suicide or make it controllable so that they could make cold war, soviet-like neuroscience experiments where they isolated the chimp brain, kept it alive and stored it in the vase for purposes of science.

The school system hasn't even designed such a hypothetical gedanken experiment or created a raising, domain transfer environment and there are no spears, axes or other otherwise fun activities on the beach which would make their life easier and no markings on how to deal with such a situation.

These people are saints, leaders, holy figures and so on. They have skin in the game and soul in the game at the same time. In most advanced societies somebody would give you a cooling-off period and then after, let's say 6 months, ask you about some communication sign. You would point the finger up and he would shoot you.

Some researcher ignores the Big Tech imposed trends and put the chains from point A to point B and before the intervention somehow count the probability that there will be a shark attack.

Scenario #2: Fighting cultural trends and taboo topics.

This is the disclosure of topics, injustices and personal vulnerabilities to the public.